From the Pastor's Heart

The Visiting Pastor

The day began with an unassuming invitation—one that would ripple into a reflection of legacy and faith. I asked my fourteen-year-old son if he wanted to join me on a visit to see Miss Viola, a 93-year-old lady from our church. Without hesitation, he agreed, a quiet nod of affirmation that filled me with pride.

Miss Viola wasn't just any congregant. Just a month prior, we nearly lost her. Yet her strong-willed spirit had her back in her own home, defying the odds. Up until her accident, she had been driving herself around town in her well-worn van. Something in me believed she might just find her way behind the wheel again.

We knocked on her door and waited. Long enough, in fact, that I wondered if she might not be home. I began dialing her sons to double-check when the door creaked open, revealing Miss Viola with a surprised, radiant smile. "Pastor Brent! And you brought your son!" she exclaimed. Her joy at seeing me was evident, but it was nothing compared to her delight in meeting my son.

We settled into her living room, taking our places on her cushioned chairs. Viola, ever inquisitive, directed a few questions to my son, which he answered politely. I, too, had my share of questions for her. As we spoke, a memory surfaced, almost as if Viola's home was a time machine pulling me back to my own childhood.

I remembered my mother—her compassionate heart, her quiet yet profound acts of kindness. She had often taken me along to visit shut-ins from our church. One particular visit stood out: a woman from our neighborhood battling cancer. I texted my mom later that day, trying to recall the woman's name.

"Mom, do you remember the lady from Landmark with cancer? The one we visited?" I asked.

"Yes," she replied. "She lived on the corner two streets back. Can't remember her name, though. Started with a 'C.'"

The details eluded us, but the memories remained vivid. I saw myself, a young boy, stepping into the woman's dimly lit bedroom. Her hair was gone—a casualty of chemotherapy. The image stirred confusion and a little fear in my young heart. Yet not long after, I visited again. This time, she was sitting upright on her couch, a vibrant bandana wrapped around her head, her smile as radiant as the sunshine streaming through the windows.

It wasn't just Mrs. C. My mother's kindness extended to Mrs. Jacoby, Mrs. Bryant, and many others. When Mrs. Bryant passed, we continued visiting her husband. My aunt, too, was a recipient of my mother's steadfast care during her health struggles. My mother's compassion was a constant, her actions a living sermon. Later, as a teenager, I joined her at the nursing home ministry our church supported. Mom always led with a smile and a helping hand, striking up conversations with the residents as if they were old friends. Her faith wasn't just something she believed; it was something she lived.

Her example shone brightest during one of our darkest times. My grandmother—"Grandma Kathy"—suffered a horrific car accident during my high school years. Her legs were crushed, and her survival was nothing short of miraculous. While my uncle offered support, the bulk of the caregiving fell to my mom. She spent countless hours driving to and from hospitals and rehab facilities, ensuring Grandma's needs were met. Eventually, Grandma Kathy moved into our home, where my mother became her full-time caregiver.

Today, as a pastor, I see my mother's fingerprints on my ministry. Hospital visits, home visits—these aren't just tasks; they're sacred moments of connection and care. Sitting in Viola's living room, watching her face light up as she spoke with my son, I felt the same spirit that guided my mother.

In 2 Timothy 1:5, Paul writes, "I am reminded of your sincere faith, which first lived in your grandmother Lois and in your mother Eunice and, I am persuaded, now lives in you also." My mother's faith lives in me, shaping the pastor I am today. Bringing my son along on visits isn't just about company; it's about passing down that legacy. I can only hope and pray that one day, he will carry it forward, living out a faith that serves and loves without hesitation.
